Henri Charriere, known as Papillon for his butterfly tattoo, is accused of murdering a "pimp and stool pigeon" and finds himself in court awaiting the trial. Despite his attorney's assurance that there is no real evidence, he is found guilty and sentenced to life in prison. Papillon is immediately faced with a decision. He has to almost immediately make a decision whether to appeal the sentence, Papillon decides that he will focus everything he has on escape rather than trying to get a new trial to have the sentence reversed or lessened, fearing that he would be sentenced to many years in prison regardless and would then be faced with the need to escape anyway. With the determination to escape and with some money stowed in a metal container carried in his intestine by way of his anus, Papillon begins his sentence.
